

Editor, The Times:

We are writing you concerning the past articles you have written, titled, "We're losing the battle against drugs." I feel that one of the reasons for teenagers taking drugs is that they find school boring. The teachers could help on this war tremendously if they made their courses more interesting than they are now, at least enough to get the students interested in more than just drugs.

What we need for this problem are different courses offering more than reading, writing, and arithmetic. If the school board could perform this task of general interest, we, the students concerned at Oceana, feel that the use of drugs would decrease tremendously.
